

Inverse Square Law, Light

The intensity of light observed from a source of constant intrinsic luminosity falls off as the square of the distance from the object. This is known as the inverse square law for light intensity.

As one of the fields which obey the general inverse square law, the light from a point source can be put in the form where E is called illuminance and I is called pointance.

